

(908) 293-7330
PM-NJLaw.com

INSIDE THIS ISSUE

- 1 The Ministry of Truth in America
- 2 Beating Summer Vacation Boredom
Ex-Beatle Sued for Plagiarism
- 3 Summer Crab and Lemon Carbonara
How Distractions Are Hurting Us
- 4 'The Repair Shop': Relaxing and Heartwarming Television

Cozy Up With 'The Repair Shop'

A Slower, Kinder Type of TV

Reality television can be a great way to turn off your mind, but most options are full of petty drama and sarcastic remarks. For some of us, it can get a little tiring. One show out of the U.K. is taking a refreshingly gentler approach. "The Repair Shop" follows passionate craftspeople as they fix antiques, and every object they work on has a story behind it.

There are no high-stakes prizes or biting comments in "The Repair Shop." Instead, viewers peek inside a warm and inviting workshop filled with collaboration and sentimental stories. In each episode, you watch the experts perform amazing transformations and hear heartwarming tales about the connections people build with family heirlooms.

The main cast includes upholsterer Jay Blades, woodworker Will Kirk, clock repairer Steve Fletcher, leatherworker Suzie Fletcher, ceramicist Kirsten Ramsay, and metalworker Dom Chinaea. They are joined by a painting restorationist, stuffed animal repairers, and experts in glass, jewelry, and musical instruments as needed. The eclectic mix means viewers are in for a new treat every episode. The cast may work on a grandfather clock and rocking horse in one episode, only to restore a beloved teddy bear and repair a pinball machine in another.

224 Roseberry Street, Suite 4
Phillipsburg, NJ 08865

PRST STD
US POSTAGE
PAID
BOISE, ID
PERMIT 411

Some of the best moments happen when the craftspeople work together. When an old writing desk has a leather inlay or an antique clock needs a newly painted face, everyone in the shop is glad to pitch in and help restore any object. They do so with good humor, a collaborative spirit, and dedication to their craft.

But the show's real heroes are the guests who bring in their beloved keepsakes. From war mementos to antique furniture and favorite toys passed down from parents, each person who visits has a deep connection with the object that needs repairing. They tell their stories, and we see their emotional reactions to their items receiving new life.

U.S. viewers can catch "The Repair Shop" on BBC One or stream it on Discovery+. Cozy up with a cup of tea — plus a box of tissues, if you're the sentimental type — and prepare to be moved.

224 Roseberry Street, Suite 4
Phillipsburg, NJ 08865

70 Church Street, First Floor
Flemington, NJ 08822

(908) 293-7330 | PM-NJLaw.com

JULY 2022

PM Perspectives

The Ministry of Truth in America

And Its Chilling Effect on Free Speech

The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) is one of the most powerful agencies in the United States government, established after the 9/11 attacks to protect our nation from terrorism. The creation of this cabinet-level department required the most sweeping reorganization of the federal bureaucracy in our nation's history. The department is so massive that, upon its formation, 22 agencies from across the government were swallowed up by the DHS.

At a congressional budget hearing on April 27, 2022, the DHS revealed the creation of a new Disinformation Governance Board within the agency. According to a press release, DHS defines disinformation as "false information that is deliberately spread with the intent to deceive or mislead."

On the surface, stopping disinformation sounds like a noble cause. The problem is how to identify it. Even the fact-based discipline of science is ever-changing as our knowledge increases. Less than 500 years ago, all astrological "experts" considered it a fact that the Earth was the center of the universe, and Galileo was punished as a heretic for spreading his theory that the Earth revolves around the sun. More "squishy" disciplines, such as sociology, economics, and political science, are just as reliant on educated opinions as on absolute, immutable truths. Thus, what constitutes disinformation often changes depending upon one's point of view.

Moreover, censoring unpopular ideas furthers "group think," which stagnates progress by punishing those who dare to challenge the status quo. Better to ferret out lies by subjecting them to the marketplace of ideas, where they may be thoroughly debated and debunked. Driving conspiracy theories underground, where they may ferment in the minds of believers and go unchallenged, helps them to proliferate.

The very name of the Disinformation Governance Board conjures images of the Orwellian Ministry of Truth. In Orwell's dystopian novel "1984," the Ministry of Truth changed historical records, memory-holed inconvenient facts, produced propaganda to create compliant citizens, and identified dissidents for punishment or eradication.

The Biden administration tapped Nina Jankowicz to lead the Disinformation Governance Board. Jankowicz is a 33-year-old, self-described "misinformation expert" who majored in Russian and political science. It is unclear how any person could be deemed an "expert" in truth on all subjects, given that nobody could possibly possess enough facts in our increasingly complex world to dictate to the rest of society what is true and what is false. For example, despite her vast expertise, Ms. Jankowicz was unable to spot the misinformation in the Steele dossier but was quick to label the easily provable Hunter Biden laptop story a Russian hoax. Putting her at the head of the board underscored the political nature of this ill-conceived project.

DHS Secretary Alejandro Mayorkas was asked whether he could guarantee that the board would not be used to monitor the speech of everyday Americans. Mayorkas denied that the board would do so but could not make any guarantee. When asked what the board's tasks would be, he answered: "It will gather together best practices and disseminate those to the operators that have been executing and operating this threat for years." What does that word salad mean? Presumably, the board would be identifying news reports and commentary which do not fit the government narrative and subject the perpetrator to investigation and punishment by another agency. The government need not disprove the alleged disinformation — the goal of silencing speakers would be accomplished by keeping them busy defending themselves before the IRS, FBI, CIA, Federal Election Commission, or one of our other myriad agencies.

Critics of the board pointed out the chilling effect it would have on free speech, without taking a single action. Many Americans already hesitate to share their opinions, out of fear of being canceled for uttering an unpopular sentiment or using unfortunate phrasing. The number of people who self-censor would only increase if the government announced that "Big Brother is listening."

Thankfully, lawmakers pushed back against the establishment of the disinformation board by threatening to withhold funding. Twenty

Continued on Page 3 ...

'Mom, Dad, There's Nothing to Do!'

Keeping Kids Entertained Through Summer

Kids look forward to summer vacation all year long, but it often only takes a few days before the "I'm bored" whines begin. It gets worse; many kids will happily spend months staring at their devices, wasting time they'll never get back. So, how do you get children active and keep them entertained?

Make a summer bucket list. It even happens to adults: We blink, and the season is over. All those things we "meant" to do somehow end up having to wait another year (or more). Don't let that happen to you or your kids this year. Make sure everyone gets their fill of summer fun by making a list of can't-miss activities. Include staples like visiting the pool or the zoo — but also entertain ideas about backyard crafts and water balloon fights. Don't forget to incorporate plenty of things the kids can do at or near home. The next time they're bored, point them to the list and urge them to complete one of their activities.

Learn something new. Hear us out — this is designed to be fun. The goal here isn't to make your kid memorize multiplication tables over summer break. (Though, if you suggest it, they might find something else to do very quickly!) What interests do your kids have? Whether it's firetrucks, dinosaurs, fashion, or something else entirely, they have countless opportunities to learn more through your local library or the World Wide Web. You don't have to restrict them to book learning, either. Your kid might love the opportunity to try countless hobbies like sewing, sculpting, or even gardening.

Camp close to home. Most kids love the outdoors, and they're easily distracted by a bit of novelty. You don't have to travel far to enjoy nature — you just need a backyard, a tent, and some sleeping bags. The prospect of spending the night outside will sound thrilling to most kids. If you have young children, make it a family affair with a campfire, roasted marshmallows, and songs. Let older kids invite some friends for a unique sleepover, complete with flashlight tag and scary stories.

Summer will be over before you know it, but you and your kids can have more to show for those months — and great memories, too! Forget about "I'm bored," and prepare yourself for a new mantra: "When can we do that again?"

... continued from Cover

state attorneys general signed a letter to the DHS, threatening legal action under the First Amendment. Succumbing to public pressure, Jankowicz resigned her position, and the DHS agreed to pause the project three weeks after announcing the board's creation.

Despite the swift death of the disinformation board, it is likely to be reincarnated in other forms. On June 16, 2022, the White House announced the establishment of a task force to address online harassment and abuse, specifically focused upon women and LGBTQ+ individuals. Additional task forces or boards cannot be far behind, to crack down on unacceptable speech regarding other issues.

The sooner we acknowledge that speech is not violence and start policing actual violence, the better we will be as a society. Moreover, those who support the concept of the government monitoring speech should honestly ask themselves whether they would be quite as accepting of a board wielding such power if their political adversaries were hand-picking the board members.

-Lisa Pezzano Mickey

SUMMER CRAB AND LEMON CARBONARA

Fresh crab and lemon make this crowd-pleasing pasta dish perfect for summer.

Ingredients

- 12 oz bucatini pasta
- 1/2 cup olive oil
- 2 tbsp garlic, finely chopped
- 1/4 cup drained and rinsed capers, chopped
- 1 tsp coarsely ground black pepper
- 6 large egg yolks, beaten
- 3 oz Pecorino Romano cheese, grated
- 1/2 cup fresh chives, thinly sliced
- 8 oz fresh crabmeat
- 1 tbsp grated lemon zest
- 1 tbsp fresh lemon juice
- Sea salt or kosher salt, to taste

Directions

1. In a pot of boiling water, cook pasta until not yet al dente. Drain and reserve 1 cup cooking liquid.
2. In a large skillet over medium heat, cook oil and garlic until lightly toasted. Add capers and black pepper, then stir for 2 minutes.
3. Add reserved cooking liquid to skillet and bring to a boil over medium heat. Stir in pasta and cook until al dente. Remove from heat.
4. Stirring constantly, pour egg yolks quickly into the mixture. Add cheese and chives, stirring well until sauce is creamy. Add crab, lemon zest, and lemon juice. Toss together and season with salt.

Inspired by FoodAndWine.com

OVERCOMING INATTENTION

Strategies to Fight Distraction

With our phones always on standby, we're more easily distracted than ever. Then there are also interruptions by coworkers or family members, emails or instant messages that divert our attention, household chores that will "only take a minute," coffee breaks, and daydreams. Constant distraction hurts us more than we realize, creating a feedback loop of inattention. It's time we understand what all this multitasking is doing to our minds and figure out how to break the cycle.

No matter how good you think you are at it, multitasking doesn't exist. What we're really doing is called task-switching. Our brains can concentrate on only one thing at a time, and the quicker we go back and forth between tasks, the less we pay attention, and the more likely we are to make mistakes. Even worse, research says it takes us a whopping 23 minutes to regain our concentration after being interrupted.

But what can you do? If you've ever been on a diet, you know that willpower has its limits. Simply promising you won't check your email or phone rarely results in long-term success. But if technology is a big part of the problem, it can also be part of the solution. Try putting your email or phone notifications on silent. Or, consider a website blocker to keep you off distracting websites and an app that will lock distracting features on your phone. Low-tech solutions like a "do not disturb" sign and putting your phone in another room can also help.

And mental tricks can still have their place. You probably tend to become productive when you've got a deadline crunch, and there's a reason for that. Tasks have a way of stretching out unnecessarily when we don't have to follow any restrictions. So, make some! Determine how much time you need to complete a task, and then don't allow yourself any more than that. Ask a colleague for help staying accountable. You'll be amazed at how much you get done.

Though we each have to fight our own battles, this isn't entirely our fault. Popular apps make billions of dollars by sucking our attention away from everything else, so we're automatically at a disadvantage. And there may be even more than meets the eye. If you have difficulty concentrating, stress could be the underlying culprit. Get that under control, and distractions might suddenly lose some of their allure.

He's So Fined

George Harrison's Plagiarism Saga

In November 1970, George Harrison released his first solo single and biggest hit, "My Sweet Lord." The song shot to No. 1 internationally and achieved the rare feat of bringing religious devotion to the pop charts. Only one problem arose — despite what the record label said, George Harrison didn't write it.

"He's So Fine" was written by Ronnie Mack and recorded by The Chiffons only seven years earlier. It became a hit in its own right, with Billboard ranking it as the fifth-biggest single of 1963. Though Harrison had dramatically rearranged the song and written new lyrics, the similarities between "He's So Fine" and "My Sweet Lord" were undeniable to even the casual listener.

Despite Harrison's lyric that "it takes so long," the song's owner, Bright Tunes, wasted no time filing a plagiarism lawsuit in February 1971. It also didn't take Harrison long to realize his mistake. In fact, the "quiet Beatle" later confessed to the similarities in his book "I Me Mine," asking, "Why didn't I realize?"

Harrison's manager, Allen Klein, thought he could make the matter go away by throwing money at it. He suggested that the wealthy Harrison buy Bright Tunes so that he would own the rights to both songs. Bright Tunes rejected the offer, and the case went to court. The judge found Harrison guilty of "subconscious plagiarism" in 1976 and ordered him to pay lost royalties.

But Klein had a ruthless reputation and made an unexpected move. Having been fired by Harrison in 1973, Klein began pursuing a purchase of Bright Tunes on his own starting around 1975. By 1978, Klein owned the catalog and had effectively switched sides in the case, leaving Harrison stunned. It took several more years of legal wrangling (the case was finally resolved in 1998!), but in 1981, Klein sold Harrison "He's So Fine" for $587,000. Many experts declared that price to be a steal.

Despite the public spectacle, Harrison had few regrets about his copycat hit. "I don't feel bad or guilty about it," he wrote in his autobiography. "It saved many a heroin addict's life. I know the motive behind writing the song in the first place far exceeds the legal hassle." In fact, the ordeal served as inspiration for his tongue-in-cheek single, "This Song," released in 1976 — proving that a good artist can find inspiration anywhere.